Session I: Trillions of Forints May Flow out of the Hungarian Government Bond Market

This year, nearly 3,000 billion forints in principal and interest payments will burden the Hungarian State Treasury, with 1,800 billion forints allocated to premium government bonds, most of which are due in the first quarter of the year. The interest rate on one of the most popular Hungarian government bonds, the PMÁP, will drop significantly, raising the critical question of what will happen to the nearly 6,500 billion forint portfolio.

The expected outflow from the government bond market, where savings might find their place, and what is worth investing in during 2025 will be discussed with government bond and capital market experts.

Session II: How to Reorganise Investment Portfolios in 2025

Donald Trump will begin his next presidential term this year, and not entirely independently of this, significant changes may occur in the course of the Ukraine war. These events will influence investments through various channels (tariffs, globalisation, inflation, economic growth, investor risk appetite, etc.). We will discuss the potential of domestic stocks, residential real estate, artworks, and cryptocurrencies with our experts to determine whether it is worth investing in an apartment, contemporary paintings, or Dogecoin at this time.
