I. Will 2019 be a crisis year? Opinions from market professionals

It very much appears that 2019 will not be an easier year than 2018 was in terms of yields, and many people are anticipating the next crisis this year. This section aims to discuss, with renowned macroeconomic and market analysts, whether it is indeed time to flee the capital markets, how likely a recession is this year, and what kind of year the bond and stock markets can expect.

II/B Can Hungarians be diverted from retail government securities? - Answers from savings and investment market leaders

Ever since Hungarians took a liking to retail government securities, many other savings and investment products have been floundering: the assets of investment funds have been unchanged for several years, wealth held in shares can not produce real growth, while retirement funds and pension insurers have been unable to secure substantial investments from customers. In this section, savings and investment market leaders will give us an overview of what instruments could be used to lure retail investors away from government securities and to mobilise the large amounts of cash currently kept under the mattress, while we also look at sensitive issues such as commissions, profit margins and future sales trends.

III/A Alternative investments gaining ground - Oil, gold and all kinds of properties

Beside capital markets, commodity markets also received increased attention last year: oil became the focus of attention after the slump beginning in October, and the same goes for gold, regarding which there is uncertainty whether it will be actually resistant to the next crisis. This section aims to provide an overview of other investment opportunities for those who are willing to look beyond traditional investments and try alternatives such as the commodity or property markets.

III/B Strategic changes at investment funds - What will the fund of the future be?

There have been several regulatory changes in 2018 and 2019 regarding domestic investment funds, including the introduction of the MiFID II directive, tighter money market regulations, and the inclusion of the shares of regulated property investment companies as an investment opportunity for property funds.

Meanwhile, the restructuring of investment funds has been increasingly spectacular as property funds now account for a quarter of assets managed. In this section, we will look at the future of investment funds in the current yield and capital market environment, explore whether any basic category can keep competing with property funds, and look at why certain providers exclude basic types evidently favoured by investors.

Moderator: Ágnes Árgyelán, Analyst, Portfolio

IV. Star bankers and brokers in one place - What do customers need?

There has been much discussion about the challenges private bankers face, including the difficulties of customer acquisition or finding more efficient channels for the money of customers. We hear less about what informs the investments of premium private banking customers, about what they think of an upcoming market collapse, and what is the most important thing they expect from their private banking providers. This section will feature Hungary's star private bankers and brokers, who will help us examine what private banking customers really desire, how they think, how they invest, and what they learned from the 2008 crisis, while also sharing the most exciting actual stories from the past couple of years.
